HEADLINE: Trashing of files questioned

BYLINE: By JOHN F. BARTON

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

KEYWORD: Files

BODY:

The United States archivist says there's nothing of significance in files on civil service security investigations of 2 million Americans between 1928 and 1959, including some loyalty cases.

Proprietary to the United Press International , October 6, 1981

Archivist Robert Warner wants permission from Congress to throw the files out because they are taking up 20,000 cubic feet of storage space which could be used for other things.

But Sen. Jeremiah Denton, R-Ala., chairman of the Senate Judiciary subcommittee on security and terrorism, said he doubts the files have been checked thoroughly enough to make sure nothing of significance is in them.

Warner told the panel Monday most of the files contain information about an individual's character, conduct and behavior in the community, and were compiled to determine suitability for work in the federal government.

But the files also contain investigations about some people's loyalty to the United States, Warner said.

All the records were approved for disposal in 1960, Warner said. But Denton said Congress has never given permission because it was not satisfied a thorough check of the files had been made.

Warner said that based on another check of the files, 'I believe that the earlier conclusion -- that the files, as a group, do not warrant permanent retention -- is still valid.'

Proprietary to the United Press International , October 6, 1981

Under questioning by Denton, Warner acknowledged that only 50 of the 2 million files had been checked for the most recent determination.

'That's not an adequate base to make a valid conclusion they are of no historical significance,' Denton said.

Francis McNamara, executive director of the Hale Foundation, said the files should not be destroyed because they contain vital intelligence information.

McNamara said the Office of Personnel Management needs access to extensive information to determine the current and past character 'of individuals they investigate and the organizations with which they have been affiliated.'

McNamara said the files should be returned to the personnel office, which 'should reinstitute practical, everyday use of them.'
